

WHITE CONDUIT FIELDS ILLUSTRATIONS

1. Looking from North to South, tea rooms in background

The building on the far side of the ground looks just a little like the one in the 1749 view of White Conduit House, at least as far as the roof turret is concerned, but the two wings are absent. I do not however believe that is what it is. The small hill in the background is reminiscent of one in the 1731 the view above, which the caption says, is a South view; incidentally, I believe a South view is a view looking from the South, not to it, so this illustration is looking North, the opposite way to the Dighton illustration. The hill in the background could well be Highgate.

2 Looking from South to North, Highgate Hill in background

The building on the far side of the ground looks just a little like the one in the 1749 view of White Conduit House, at least as far as the roof turret is concerned, but the two wings are absent. I do not however believe that is what it is. The small hill in the background is reminiscent of one in the 1731 the view above, which the caption says, is a South view; incidentally, I believe a South view is a view looking from the South, not to it, so this illustration is looking North, the opposite way to the Dighton illustration. The hill in the background could well be Highgate.

This is a similar image to the one above, the hills and the house with the belvedere are again visible. This time there is a crowd as well, but some similarities are so precise that it is probably a pastiche. It is supposedly an illustration of a match between The White Conduit Club and eleven gentlemen of Surrey; this would, I think, date the picture around the 1770s.

Page 25

From an old print.

White Conduit Club at play—1787. (The forerunners of the M.C.C.)